

wouldn't make it all the way back.

After a quick, ~~the~~ broken conversation with X-Ray (our command post) we received - static - instruction to - static - stay at - static - location for the night. We would, however, wait for the wrecker to tow the truck. As we waited, we noticed the Chow hall ~~they~~ had set up in the Brigade area, "What the hell," we thought as we exited our APC and made our way over to get a hot meal. They had it good to. The Brigade Chow Hall was set up as a walk through ~~hall~~ and actually contained a kitchen. It was great - they even had a portable hand wash station so that you could wash your hands before eating. What luxury. Perhaps the most impressive sight there, however, was the 48 Apaches lined up abreast. The helicopters subverters stretched 71 to the horizon.

Shortly after dark, the wrecker arrived and we piled back into the 113 for the journey to our Field Station. It took around 45 minutes for the wrecker with ~~device~~ ~~could~~ a half in tow to make the trip from the BSt to the munitions factory where the notice the drag man, in his early-mid thirties until later. As I didn't know what was going on so I tried to move ~~un~~noticed into the "waiting room" off to the right of the lobby - where the medics usually hang out. A sergeant was there and he helped me find my stuff, and then as I turned and was to leave, I saw. On the litter, surrounded by our medical personnel and the ~~hand~~ ~~litter~~, was a little boy. He must not have been older than 6. His face was covered in blood that looked like it had run from his nose and mouth, and one of his legs was also soaked in claying blood. He just lay there lifeless, not breathing, dead. ~~He~~ Then I noticed his father, fighting back the tears of sadness, anger, and frustration. His beard turned covered in blood from where he had clutched his child against him in an attempt to carry him to our aid station for help. I saw him and involuntarily looked out at the child again. As I ~~there~~ suddenly became a blur. ~~As~~ I turned and silently walked out, carrying my computer
