

Otherwise, Jen, I am still healthy and doing fine. I have been working out—what a struggle, and reminiscing about the times we spent at A6, the PVs, and the BBQs we used to have with the Koreans. Those were fun times weren't they? I've been wondering how Steve is doing, and I miss us all just sitting outside sipping on a few brews and getting rowdy. I still don't know how you used to wake up so early after getting smashed. I remember how you used to come back from Starbucks, all chipper, and I hadn't even been able to get my ass out of bed yet!

Remember when we first went to see Sergeant Pierce. He said, "Yeah, you can go to basic training together. It's called the buddy program." Whatever dude. He should have been a door to door salesman. The funny thing about is that we probably still would have done it. We would probably still be here today. The only thing that I would change is switching from Field Artillery to Chemical. I'm sure all of this will pay off one day. The biggest problem with the Army is the extensive time away from home, and it doesn't look like that will get better anytime soon. All I hope is that when we come back that we get to stay home for a little while, and when the time comes I will get out and go back to school. I just hope that the job market picks up. What do you think?

Ok baby, I miss you and I hope that you are doing well. I'm sure that everything is fine. Give Mason a kiss for me—I really wish I could see you guys; sit on the back porch and relax on a nice summer evening. You can't imagine how I will feel when I finally snuggle into my luxurious coach seat for the flight home. Hell, I don't know how I will feel. It will be intense.

I love you,

Christian

P.S.

It is actually 133 degrees today.
